Yeshiva of Virginia

What kind of ben Torah should your son become?

The kind of ben Torah who knows Torah, halachah and hashkafah, and who also lives by them.

Who honors his parents, performs chesed, welcomes strangers, visits the sick, helps the needy, devotes himself to tefilah and brings shalom between his fellow Jews. Who's drawn not only to the sforim, but also to their authors; not only to the learning, but also to those who teach it.

The kind of ben Torah your son becomes depends on the yeshiva he goes to. At Yeshiva of Virginia, he'll not only learn Torah, but he'll also learn to live Torah.

"I really like the Yeshiva," says a student from Long Island. "I think the rules are great, they force the students to be accountable. I like the values the yeshiva has and even its discipline. I like the goals it has. The Rebbeim and teachers are really great people and are very nice. I really like the basketball team and the work ethic it has."

Another student's father agrees. "I expected a warm yeshiva with one-on-one attention," he writes, "with an emphasis on excellent midos, honesty and integrity. That each person should not be just a mechanical Jew. That a young man should be able to appreciate the good that Hashem has bestowed in his life and accept the curve balls that may be thrown by the Pitcher up above. These attributes and more, I believe the Yeshiva is implementing in my son and all the young men who attend."

The right Yeshiva can make the difference between your son learning Torah and his living it with all his heart, with all his soul and with all his might.
